

Governor of Maine Orders Restaurant Staff to Wear COVID Visors Like Dog Cones

“Must now wear them upside down so that they are attached at the collar instead of the forehead.”

Published 3 years ago on 20 August, 2020

The Governor of Maine has ordered restaurant staff to wear anti-COVID visors upside down so they resemble dog cones in order to direct breath upwards.

Yes, really.

Governor Janet Mills' decree states that "front-of-house staff in restaurants who choose to wear face shields must now wear them upside down so that they are attached at the collar instead of the forehead, so that their breath is directed up, not down," reports Maine Public Radio.

Given that air conditioning units can facilitate the spread of coronavirus, Mills' order looks like another ridiculous and pointless measure.

"As a symbol of submission, forcing us to obliterate our individuality by wearing masks was not explicit enough," writes Dave Blount. "So they pushed the envelope even further. No one can miss the significance of making people wear dog cones."

Gov Janet Mills says – servers must now wear face shields upside down so that their breath is directed up, not down. Yes she wants you to wear a dog cone... peak insanity. I wish this was a joke.. its real #facecovering #faceshield pic.twitter.com/cnyojzTd3c

— Dr Sherri Tenpenny (@BusyDrT) August 19, 2020

Last week, the CDC announced that masks with valves, which millions of people around the world have been wearing for months, do "not prevent the person wearing the mask from transmitting COVID-19 to others."

As we highlighted earlier, Sweden's top expert on the coronavirus, Anders Tengell, warned that encouraging people to wear face masks is "very dangerous" because it gives a false sense of security but does not effectively stem the spread of the virus.

As we explain in the video below, the issue of masks has become both a logistical and political minefield.